As I understand, even if all the object models are built, XAML file doesn't have to be built in order to produce an application. I use T4 to build my application. Is there a way to make T4 generate XAML into the build directory so that when the application is built the XAML is included? Currently I have to rebuild XAML when using it as a resource in another application. A: This is pretty specific to T4, and I can't answer it directly. I'd say to check out (which I don't have access to right now). There's a list of targets that are automatically generated based on XAML, and they include "Assembly" and "Package". I believe that the Assembly target will do what you're looking for. If you get it to work, I'd be interested to know the result. People tend to imagine they are special. We all have this belief, no matter how we dress. When it comes to buying clothes, we all have a certain image in our minds. A fancy car? You are going to have a shiny floor mat. A giant home with a pool? Don't be surprised when the family ends up with some strange bathroom tile. A designer jacket? You are going to be in the luxury cruise line business. The problem is, all of those things are not necessarily going to happen. And if they do happen, they are going to be expensive. Believing that you are special is a very common problem in the American economy. That's because every man thinks he can do something that no other man can do. That's how you get the character flaw 2492ce491b
