1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a connecting rod for connecting an internal combustion engine to a rotary-type compressor. More particularly, the invention relates to a connecting rod of this type which includes a piston inserted into an outer tubular member and a connecting portion, which is connected to the piston and the outer tubular member and in which gas-tight sealing and a function as an elastic body are required.

2. Description of the Related Art In a connecting rod for connecting an internal combustion engine to a rotary-type compressor, a connecting portion which is connected to a piston and a piston rod of the internal combustion engine is used as a center portion. A cylinder portion of the connecting portion is inserted into a sleeve-like outer tubular member. The cylinder portion has a sealing lip portion. Gas-tight sealing is required between the outer tubular member and the cylinder portion. Furthermore, an elastically-deformable portion is provided between the cylinder portion and the outer tubular member. In this manner, the connecting rod of this type is known (JP-A-2004-108325). A rod for a fluid compressor disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 6,039,933 has an outer tubular member and a center portion formed from the outer tubular member. A piston is inserted into the outer tubular member. The piston is provided with a pressure-receiving portion and a cavity portion. In the cavity portion, a spring is accommodated. In this manner, the rod for a fluid compressor is also known. In the rod for a fluid compressor, the center portion is formed by boring a cylindrical portion from the outer tubular member. In the center portion, a through-hole is formed. The through-hole is larger
