A simple electrical circuit simulates a contactor. A contactor is a device that switches current on and off. Contactors are used to “turn on” or “turn off” large electrical equipment such as motors and induction furnaces. The most common types of contactors are spring-operated and fluid-operated. Contactors normally have a switch in the current path for each phase of the circuit. Current is on when the contactor is open and current is off when the contactor is closed. There are two types of contactors, a sliding contactor and a make and break contactor. For the sliding contactor, the switch opens and closes in conjunction with the movement of the contactor. If the contactor is open, the contact will remain open and the current will flow through the switch. If the contactor is closed, the switch will remain closed so no current will flow. The make and break contactor has springs that force the contact to open and close independently of the contactor position. The make and break switch will remain closed if the contactor is closed but if the contactor is open, the switch will remain open. A variable or a step-down transformer is a transformer with a secondary winding that is a fraction of the
