Category: Third-person shooters [Risk stratification and treatment of pulmonary embolism]. Pulmonary embolism is a life-threatening disease. The incidence is much higher in patients who receive warfarin anticoagulation than in patients who receive no anticoagulation. The prevalence of idiopathic pulmonary embolism is 6-13% in the general population. The mortality rate remains approximately 5%, but the risk of recurrence after a first episode is high. This condition must be distinguished from thromboembolic complications in the absence of an underlying disorder, such as Budd-Chiari syndrome, primary antiphospholipid syndrome, massive venous thrombosis or tumoral embolism. The therapeutic strategy is based on an initial approach to the patient based on the severity of the presenting features. Observation remains the first option in patients with very low risk of death, a history of recurrent or subacute pulmonary embolism, or a suspicion of an underlying condition. Low-molecular weight heparin or fondaparinux are the first-choice treatment in patients with intermediate or high risk of death or recurrence. Warfarin is used as a second-line treatment in patients at intermediate risk. In the presence of contraindication to heparin therapy, or where pharmacological treatment is associated with high risks, treatment with catheter-directed thrombolytic therapy or surgical embolectomy is
