particularly to a differential circuit capable of providing fast gain reduction after detection of output signal peak values which peak values have to be reduced to ensure the stability of the circuit. In a differential type amplifier, a differential amplifier is constructed by two emitter

coupled transistors. The input signal is applied to the base of the first transistor and the output of the first transistor is connected to the base of the second transistor. The output of the second transistor is the output of the differential amplifier. Therefore, in the differential amplifier, gain of the input signal is obtained by dividing the output of the second transistor with the output of the first transistor. Therefore, the differential amplifier is suitable for operating at a high speed, for example, a bit rate of 100 MHz or more. However, when gain of the differential amplifier is low, peak of the output signal is not reduced after amplification of the input signal. Therefore, in order to provide a good output signal at a small power supply voltage, the peak voltage must be reduced before outputting
