Preview: Croke Park Last weekend saw what might well be the final hurrah of the year's rugby schedule. In some ways, it was a week to forget for Munster: a maul-fest in Thomond Park, a no-show against Connacht and a shellacking for the provinces in the Heineken Cup. But it's a happy time to be a Munster rugby supporter: All Blacks in New Zealand, Gloucester in Wales, Northampton in England. South Africa and Ireland are way down in the doldrums. Of course, Munster fans (and the coaches) would love to be battling for the Heineken Cup but if the other provinces decide to oust them, that won't be on anybody's radar. But this weekend is about Munster hosting Brive in the French Top 14 at Thomond Park. It's a clash of rich and poor, a nod to the financial pressures facing Rugby Ireland. There were legitimate claims that the game was moved from June to ensure that the country's largest stadium would be up to scratch for next season's Heineken Cup. So, while Munster could be out of the European Cup, they are in the Cup final – and they are not alone. The other Irish provinces – Connacht, Leinster, Ulster and, as it happens, Munster – are all involved in the final of the Rugby Europe Cup, which will be played tomorrow at Twickenham. This is a change from last season when Connacht were in the same group, but is one way of acknowledging that rugby is set for a financial boom here and won't escape the financial squeeze. When I interviewed Brian O'Driscoll last week, he said rugby needed to be run by a board of directors and that the IRFU should be looking to that as a way of making sure Ireland goes from strength to strength. The fact that the IRFU will not be involved is one more good reason to suggest that we should take a step back and let the directors do the work. the plaintiff failed to timely file her claim with the Secretary and her claim was therefore deemed denied); and see Pl.'s Opp. at 5 (requesting that "no other material facts be deemed to be in dispute"). Migrating from a legacy application to the Cloud can be one of the biggest challenges for any organization. Unfortunately, the process is often more difficult than it needs to be. So let's start by defining the 2 primary phases of moving to the cloud, and then see what you can do about each of them. Phase 1 – Migrating Hardware to the Cloud This is probably the hardest aspect of the migration, as it includes upgrading your servers, network configuration, patching, new security measures, taking snapshots, and off site data backups. You'll typically spend most of your time running through this process. If you're a small company with 2 servers, and an expensive backup system, the only way you can finish your migration is if you can successfully reconfigure the network and reach a level of technical expertise that most CIO's don't have. This is also true for companies that have 2 or more data centers, where each data center would need to be taken offline and merged into a unified cloud. Phase 2 – Migrating Business Software to the Cloud Once the network configuration has been successfully completed, you'll be ready to turn your attention to the business software aspect of the migration. Many times, I can see companies rushing to complete the migration before the first phase is completed. If this is the case, it will be virtually impossible to complete all aspects of the migration. The second phase is the most critical, and it must occur after the hardware phase. Legacy applications and database are usually the 2 biggest challenges, and anything that disrupts these systems will ultimately leave your company in the dust. Think of the potential downtime of your existing business software that slows down the process of migrating data into the cloud. Think about the ridiculous cost of licensing fees and server hardware. Then, think about the additional costs of training an IT team to keep the applications running. Here are the most important steps to success. Implement a business continuity plan. This makes sure that you are not merely able to take snapshots of your current applications and databases. It also makes sure that your business continuity plan can protect your existing data. A good one is 1 weekend a month, and then 1 weekend a year. This will protect your existing data for at least 2 years. Take a full backup of your data before you begin the transition. Ensure that you have a solid plan for migrating
