Lubricants are often used to reduce friction and improve the wear properties of components which are in relative motion, such as sliding against each other. Friction in a moving machine can cause excessive power consumption, reduced efficiency, and excessive wear of the machine components. Various lubricants have been developed to reduce friction and prevent wear, such as for example, greases, gums, and other various oils and polymer blends. Greases have been proven to be a reliable choice for numerous applications, such as gearbox oil, piston oil, hydraulics, electric motors, and to a certain degree, in piston rings for engines. While greases have excellent friction properties, they are prone to drying out, oxidize, and to a certain degree, get contaminated with unwanted inclusions. Greases have also been proven to be easily separated from the parts they lubricate. Such separations can cause problems when used in demanding conditions, such as, for example, in an aircraft's hydraulic system. Gums and polymer blends can be used to improve friction and wear properties, but they are prone to undesired adhesion to components or to each other. In the case of piston rings, this can create problems, as the gum will form a bond to the piston, which will reduce its effectiveness. Greases, gums, and polymer blends can also be damaged by solvents or corrosion, causing problems in both the machine and machine's ability to perform in harsh conditions. Silicon compounds have recently been developed that can be used as replacements for conventional lubricants in some applications. When properly applied, silicon and silicon-based compounds have been proven to have good friction and wear properties, and, in some cases, can provide improved corrosion and solvent resistance. However, the silicon-based compounds are not completely without problems. Many silicon compounds are hygroscopic and so will tend to absorb moisture, such as, for example, from a humid environment. This causes the silicon compound to swell and potentially fill or saturate the grooves or other microscopic spaces on the surface of the components it is lubricating, potentially leading to the formation of a soft or sticky film. This soft film can stick to, or “adhere to”, the components it lubricates, potentially causing problems, such as, for example, the sticking of the silicone material to the piston and causing a build up of the
