Heretofore, an adhesive composition of an epoxy resin and a phenolic resin has been frequently used as a bonding agent for bonding a heat-fused film, particularly a metal foil to a substrate in the preparation of a substrate for a liquid crystal display device (LCD) such as a liquid crystal cell. Such an adhesive composition has excellent heat resistance and adhesion to the substrates and metals. However, it has a problem in its environmental pollution property. In recent years, it has been studied to use an adhesive composition of an acrylonitrile-butadiene-styrene copolymer resin (hereinafter referred to as ABS resin) as a bonding agent for the LCD. However, since such an ABS resin has poor heat resistance and adhesion to substrates and metals, it is required to impart heat resistance and adhesion to the ABS resin by admixing with a coupling agent. However, when a coupling agent is added in a large amount, the heat resistance and adhesion are decreased and the adhesive composition becomes excessively brittle. Further, in order to prepare an adhesive composition of the ABS resin, it is essential to effect copolymerization in a large amount of a conjugated diene monomer. Therefore, its environmental pollution is severe. For example, it has been pointed out that carbon dioxide is exhausted in a large amount in the process of preparing the adhesive composition and an environmental polluting substance is added in the process of preparing the adhesive composition. Further, a bonding agent of an epoxy resin has poor heat resistance and a bonding agent of an acrylic resin has poor adhesion to substrates and metals. In order to overcome such problems, it has been attempted to use an acrylic ester having a high copolymerization degree of a monocarboxylic acid component as an acrylic monomer as a copolymerizable component. The acrylic ester has a
