The subproject and investigator (PI) may have received primary funding from another NIH source, and thus could be represented in other CRISP entries. The institution listed is for the Center, which is not necessarily the institution for the investigator. The Department of Human Genetics at the University of Utah School of Medicine is a NIGMS-funded High-Throughput Center of Excellence in genomics and researcher computing, representing a collaborative effort between the Departments of Human Genetics, Informatics, Biology, and Pharmacy. The mission of the Center is to provide leadership and expertise to support transdisciplinary research that harnesses the power of genomics and information technology to address significant human health problems, including hypertension, diabetes, asthma, cancer, cardiovascular disease, and neurodegenerative disease. The departments collaborate in research that involves the analysis of genomic and large scale biological data to identify potential therapeutic targets for these diseases. Hypophysiotropic factor in a rat hypothalamic cell line. Hypophysiotropic factor (HIF), a non-prolactin hypothalamic factor released in association with suckling, stimulates the proliferation of rat pituitary lactotropes. We have prepared a rat hypothalamic cell line (HrLT-14) that synthesizes and secretes HIF and that retains all the characteristics of the pituitary lactotropes in terms of morphology, GH-releasing factor (GRF) and somatostatin (SRIF) receptors, GRF-binding capacity, and cytosolic calcium responses to GRF and SRIF. The factor is released basolaterally, as measured by the accumulation of 125I-GRF in the medium, and HIF release corresponds temporally to the changes in cytosolic calcium in response to GRF and SRIF. These data and the location of GRF receptors on the cell surface suggest that HIF may act within the hypothalamo-pituitary axis and through stimulation of GRF receptors rather than by diffusion. 1.
