Luminescent Luxeon D4YS organic light emitting diode (OLED) bulb is about five times brighter than its predecessor D2, says its maker. As an alternative to white OLED lighting, the E27 bulb has red, blue and green emitting components built into a single tube. It's 10 times brighter than white OLED and will be available for £59.99 from November. "Energy-efficient lighting is being presented as a major challenger to traditional incandescent bulbs," said James Murray, head of communications at Lumileds Lighting Europe. "The natural colour rendition of the new D4YS device is suitable for virtually all types of rooms and lighting applications." Blue and green light Lumileds is hoping the new bulb will appeal to designers looking for bold colours. The three-component device can emit up to 60 lumens in each of its components. "White OLED has been the lighting industry's choice to improve energy efficiency but its brightness is not always a decisive factor," added Murray. "The new D4YS device is suitable for virtually any lighting application as it is five times brighter than the previous D2 device, while delivering the same colour temperature." The Lumileds devices are made using the same process as OLED TVs but are much easier to manufacture. The company says the breakthrough came from replacing a proprietary transistor with one that had already been approved for use in consumer electronics. As well as power saving, the new bulb will have less operating voltage than white OLED and will draw less current. It is claimed to last eight years, two and a half times longer than a typical white LED and a full four times longer than a traditional incandescent. The new device is also claimed to not degrade over time like many
