If I'm not mistaken it's a pretty significant update. While it's good that they're improving Azure AD, the fact that they're only giving a preview for O365 is not an indication that they're "giving up" on Office 365 (which is what I'm assuming you're suggesting). I'm also confused about your last sentence, "Microsoft is good at focusing on a single product." I think the opposite is true. Microsoft has been pretty much cutting off support for all their products in favor of a new (Windows Phone, Surface, Xbox...) whatever comes next. They have effectively been focusing on a single product for a long time, which is why so much of their product is obsolete. That's the

What are the hardware requirements for this code? static int foo(int n) { int i = n; while(i--){ i*=2; } return i; } I know that it will modify every value of i inside the loop, so the register changes may be a problem, but does this particular code have a special requirement or is it just a compiler optimization? A: A simple compiler (most compilers) will compile this to a series of memory reads and writes. You are concerned about writing to memory, but this is the kind of thing that can be handled by a compiler. My compilers have at least a couple optimizations that make things like this not too bad. First, they can apply a loop unroll to any of these. Also, they can apply a whole bunch of other optimizations to this. For example, if you had an array of ints called int i[100], they might be able to figure out that you never actually use more than 3. This would allow the array to be cut in half. This is a big deal when dealing with high-performance code, since memory accesses can be very costly. In short, your code should not generate any memory accesses. Of course, this depends on the compiler, but if the code does not do anything, and is doing something small like this, then it is likely to not generate any memory accesses.
