This study is concerned with heavy metal pollution and its effect on the primary components of humic substances in an unpolluted watershed. In order to get a better understanding of the physiological activities of metals at the molecular level, a model of humic material was established with the aim of correlating the activation state of humic substances to the heavy metal ions. A serial set of MALDI-TOF-TOF mass spectroscopy (MS) were performed to elucidate the micro-structure of humic material. A weak impact of divalent metal ions on the structure of humic substances was found, while the presence of multivalent metal ions (such as Zn(2+), Al(3+), Fe(3+), and Pb(2+)) resulted in the desorption and/or lysis of humic substances. Proton nuclear magnetic resonance (NMR) spectroscopy was used to quantitatively investigate the effect of metal-humic substances interaction, and the peak intensity of the cross peaks between protons of aromatic and carboxylic acid groups derived from humic substances was assessed in order to understand the location of carboxylic acid groups of humic substances. The results indicated that the presence of Cu(2+), Zn(2+), Al(3+), and Pb(2+) stimulated the hydrolysis of humic substances, and the carboxylic acid groups at the end of humic chains were cleaved and released. The formation of carboxylic acid groups on humic substances was concluded to be the primary mechanism of humic substances interaction with heavy metal ions. The Shortening of the Light Game for the Future The most popular of the three set of chess principles is the easy checkmate, and this is based on a first pawn advance. The first move of a pawn is made to increase the possession of the squares that are needed to be taken advantage of, and this is what makes the light game. The most important function of the light game is to create a hole that will lead to a checkmate. When a hole has been created, checkmate is a certain prospect. To create a hole
