"With our new playing style, the ball will be able to go wherever you command," said FIFA Global Brand Lead Peter Bosz. "We encourage you to play without thinking, to focus on driving forward in attack and create the chance to score." The "Live Training" feature allows players to compete against their own past performances in a highly realistic virtual environment. Players can use their own movement and tactics, and then reproduce and compare them to their old FIFA performance. The tool also contains a database of games played with real-life players, allowing players to compare their own performance with the world's best. Moving your players with precision and control is paramount to success with FIFA 22 and "Passing in Motion" requires accurate ball-weighting and positioning to deliver quality passing. Players can now shift the ball with a slide to receive passes, and the defense makes quick steps to prevent goal scoring from opposition attackers by shielding the goal. "Based on thousands of hours of gameplay data from around the world, FIFA 22 lets you know where the ball is going to go, and through what angle," Bosz said. "It's the first football game to let you manipulate the speed of the ball to set up the perfect pass. When attacking, players can choose to change the direction of their runs, and when defending, they can decide whether to take a step back to gain advantage of their defense." "FIFA has always been about football, and now we're even better positioned to deliver the real game. FIFA 22 is our most advanced FIFA yet, and we're looking forward to seeing what the community makes of it." Learn more about FIFA 22 on the FIFA website. About Electronic Arts Inc.
