The human TCR-alpha chain is necessary for antigen recognition by T cells, and therefore, this cDNA may encode the immunologic receptor for viral or other tumor antigens. First, we will use cDNA expression libraries constructed from normal and malignant human lymphoid tissues to isolate recombinants that encode the human TCR-alpha chain. We will initially screen by partial sequence analysis and identify clones that cross-hybridize with known alpha-chain cDNAs. From this pool we will obtain additional alpha-chain cDNA clones by screening with the TCR-alpha cDNAs we have isolated. Second, we will identify the expressed alpha chain cDNAs by restriction enzyme analysis and partial sequencing. Third, we will use rapid amplification of cDNA ends to obtain full-length alpha-chain cDNAs, and characterize these by restriction enzyme analysis and partial sequencing. Fourth, we will detect the translated products of the alpha-chain cDNAs and evaluate the effects of TCR-alpha gene rearrangement on its expression. In this way, we can study the biochemical properties of the alpha-chain protein and its role in cellular function. As a model system to study the evolution of the human alpha-chain genes, we will also identify and clone the alpha-chain cDNAs of chimpanzee and bonobo. Knowledge of TCR-alpha gene structure and of the evolution of these genes will increase our understanding of the function of the immune system.Both Britain and the European Union have vowed to keep the pressure on Russia over the situation in Ukraine, as pro-Russian separatists continue to clap back and seize Ukrainian government buildings in the east of the country. Russia vetoed a bid to open EU sanctions against Moscow last week. British Prime Minister David Cameron vowed Laparoscopic surgery is gaining wide acceptance as a standard operative procedure in abdominal surgery, but the experience with laparoscopic surgery in gynecologic gynecologic surgery is still limited. In this article, we report the surgical outcome of the first series of laparoscopic paracolostomy in patients with chronic gynecologic symptoms associated with iatrogenic gynecologic fistula. We also compare this procedure with laparoscopic cholecystectomy. From November 1992 to August 1996, 23 patients (aged 23-68 years) with chronic gynecologic symptoms associated with iatrogenic gynecologic fistula were treated with laparoscopic paracolostomy. Their operations were compared with 24 patients (aged 20-68 years) who underwent laparoscopic cholecystectomy in the same period. The intraoperative and postoperative complications were recorded. The time taken to achieve skin incision was significantly shorter (11.1 vs. 13.4 minutes; P
