On Tuesday, the Washington Post reported that, since March, senior White House aides had been seeking to install Secretary of Agriculture Sonny Perdue as the president's chief agriculture adviser. Perdue's backers, including other White House staffers, reportedly saw him as a relatively untainted figure who could succeed former food adviser David Short in an administration that would be scarred by infighting. It appears that the president has been resistant to the idea, however. Apparently, other officials said that the job had been offered to him, but he "had reservations about taking the job and wanted to be sure that he could turn over his responsibilities to a successor once the transition was complete." This move to install Perdue as the farm czar would have been, I assume, an ill-considered and unnecessary sop to agribusiness and food interests who are generally regarded as being well-liked by the White House. White House staffers reportedly have doubts about Perdue's judgment and temperament. The question is whether a Trump administration could have done any better. The answer is probably no. It's a bit like creating a new cabinet position for a vice president, like the one he is about to hold; Donald Trump's approach to all things is to surround himself with people who are loyal to him, perhaps no matter how weak their qualifications. Theoretically, a President Trump would be surrounded by people equally loyal to each other—including himself. Unfortunately, it appears that he will not get that chance.Q: Deserializing a list of objects with a list of objects in C# I have 2 classes, lets call them "Person" and "Job" The "Person" has a collection of "Job"s and the "Job" has a list of "Person"s.
