One third of U.S. adults suffer from overweight. In addition, almost 40% of children are overweight and 30% are obese. This nutritional problem has reached epidemic proportions and is contributing to the rapidly rising prevalence of diabetes, hypertension, and heart disease. The clinical importance of nutrition is the basis of nutrition counseling. Its purpose is to correct nutritional abnormalities and to improve the patient's health status and quality of life. However, for nutrition counseling to be successful, it must be done by skilled nutrition specialists. Unfortunately, the available evidence indicates that most persons who suffer from overweight and obesity do not receive nutrition counseling in ambulatory settings. This situation is particularly true for persons who seek ambulatory care. The purpose of this paper is to review the data on the frequency of nutrition counseling in ambulatory settings and to identify the barriers to successful nutrition counseling,
