For example: Harry declines to meet with his friends,... or Harry dismisses his friends,... Is there a more idiomatic or formal way of saying this? A: Your first option is "dismiss" and your second is "refuse". The former is more formal, and the latter is more casual. "Decline" is the past participle of "decline", and I think the implication is that "Harry" was the initiator of the "meeting". If "meeting" is the spontaneous and voluntary gathering of a group of friends, then Harry's "decline" is really an indication that he wants no part of it. "Dismiss" could be applied to a person (a prior guest, for example), but would usually be used of a meeting where one or more invitees have indicated an intention not to attend. A: Harry declines to meet with his friends, or Harry declines to meet with his friends, for a variety of reasons. A: ...to decline an invitation to meet with somebody else is to simply decline an invitation. "Decline" d0c515b9f4
