Kagan's Rulings Have All the Hard Evidence Missing SCOTUSblog offers a look at the Supreme Court's decision this morning in Nieves v. Bartlett (on reporters' questions for witnesses) and Muniz v. Smith (on whether the Article III court had to conduct a hearing on child custody). For those who don't know, Professor Robert Post from USC wrote an article (in Internet Law) last year arguing that Kagan, who has never been a judge, would probably decide in favor of the reporter's privilege. The majority opinion in Nieves gives the reason why in footnote 6: Counsel's argument is based on a reading of the Sixth Amendment that elevates the right to counsel to a right to meaningful adversarial testing and the corollary that trial judges are constitutionally incompetent unless they take steps that will foster a thorough, adversarial testing of the facts and arguments presented in support of criminal convictions. This reading, however, is implausible. It does not make sense to say that the judiciary is essentially useless unless it includes trial judges who will take steps that will foster a thorough, adversarial testing of the factual basis of a criminal conviction. It makes no sense to say that the judiciary is an ineffective instrument of law unless it includes appellate judges who will take steps that will foster a thorough, adversarial testing of the reliability of the evidence and legal arguments used to support criminal convictions. Perhaps it is true that as of 2002, when the Sixth Amendment was adopted, state court judges were less than satisfied with the adversarial nature of their proceedings, but it makes no sense to say that the Sixth Amendment forbids state courts from creating procedures that will ensure an adversarial relationship for their proceedings. And in the Muniz concurrence, Justice Kagan's dissent, joined by Chief Justice Roberts, says: Alors que le nouveau gouvernement a publiquement reconnu le contenu de l'arrêté préfectoral qui interdit la consommation du sucre avant 16h sur tous les territoires, la mairie de Montpellier a annulé ce geste. C'est Le Président qui va annuler l'arrêté. La mairie de Montpellier va annuler cette sanction, explique le maire de Montpellier, @BertrandDeveaux, pic.twitter.com/
