A: In the main menu go to the bottom to Main Menu> File> Open save file Flat panel display devices, such as liquid crystal displays (LCDs), continue to improve in their capabilities to provide ever increasing levels of information and capability. Increasingly, such devices can be incorporated into applications where information is displayed or otherwise processed at a location remote from the display device itself. For instance, the display device can be incorporated into a central processing system or other type of remote control system, where the display device can present information as an output medium in response to user input provided via a remote interface. Although advances in microprocessor speed and memory availability have greatly improved the ability to transfer information in an efficient manner, the transfer and formatting of that information in a form readily usable by the display device remains a concern. Improvements in this area would allow such devices to provide the information required to present, analyze and manipulate the data in a manner most useful to the user. In order to interface with a display device remote from the display device, it is necessary to provide an interface to the remote display device. The interface provides a mechanism to provide a connection, an encoding scheme, an addressing scheme and interface control signals. In general, the remote interface will have a much lower processing power than the display device with which it is communicating. Since the processing power of the remote interface is low compared to the processing power of the display device, it is often possible to provide an interface only for certain types of communication protocols or data formats. As a result, the remote interface cannot communicate data in any manner other than the way it is designed to communicate. Conventional remote display interfaces have a difficult time translating a data stream to a format that can be used by the display device. Many remote interfaces are only designed to support one or two protocols or data formats, and it is often difficult to design a remote interface to support a larger number of protocols. In addition, remote display interfaces are constrained to operating at the same low level as their host display devices. This limits the power and capabilities of the remote interface and results in a 595f342e71
